Finally ... Spring is Here ... So is Pollen

By: Bill Gough Partner/Owner

You know what that means, it's time for seasonal allergies to begin kicking in. Not something that people who suffer from these irritants are looking forward to. Taking a proactive approach to battling allergies will help you make the best of this inconvenience.

The biggest secret to minimizing your seasonal allergy suffering is knowing what you're up against.

What is a seasonal allergy? It's an allergic reaction to a trigger that is typically only present for part of the year, such as spring. This type of allergy refers to a pollen allergy. Such as trees, weeds, and grasses.

What is pollen? Pollens are tiny, egg-shaped, powdery grains released from flowering plants, carried by the wind or insects, and serve to cross-pollinate other plants of the same type for reproductive purposes. When pollen is present in the air, it can land in a person's eyes, nose, lungs, and on their skin, causing an allergic reaction.

Unlike avoiding pet dander or simply not eating foods you know you have an allergy to, preventing seasonal allergies is a bit more complicated. It is much more difficult to avoid exposure to pollen, since it is present all around us.

9 Tips to help minimize pollen exposure:

- 1. Keep windows closed prevent pollen from drifting in your home
- 2. Minimize early morning activity when pollen is usually emitted between 5-10 a.m.
- 3. Keep car windows closed when driving
- 4. Stay indoors when pollen count is reported to be high, and on windy days when pollen is present in higher amounts
- 5. Take a vacation during height of pollen season to a more pollen-free area, such as the beach or ocean
- 6. Avoid freshly cut grass and mowing the lawn
- 7. Machine dry bedding & clothing. Pollen can collect in laundry if it's hung outside to dry
- 8. Been outdoors in it? Shower to wash/rinse body, hair & clothes. Pollen loves hair & clothes.
- 9. WASH YOUR CAR OFTEN. We can assist with this 😊
